Warman parents have concerns over Educational Assistant budget cuts

By JAMES TARRANT
james@ccgazette.ca

When a school division is forced to make cuts to educational assistant positions it is often the students that suffer the most.

Warman parent Rebecca McFarland said she was unhappy when she learned through a newsletter that 21 educational assistant (EA) positions are being cut by Prairie Spirit School Division (PSSD).

At the same time, she wasn't really surprised because there are more EA positions cut after every school year.

McFarland, who has four children that attend schools in Warman, said EA support for her son Brayden, who is in Grade 5 at Warman Community Middle School, has been a frustrating experience.

"He struggles processing reading information; basically anything to do with school. It is not as simple as seeing words, letters or numbers funny," said McFarland. "It is more complicated than that. He needs assistance especially anything with reading. He can't summarize things on his own."

McFarland found out Brayden had dyslexia two years ago but suspected he had the disability when he started school.

In the beginning McFarland said her son has received help when the EA has had time, but it is not consistent.

This year she was told by her son's teacher that he would not be receiving EA support.

Brenda Erickson, communications officer for PSSD, said EAs at PSSD can be assigned to more than one student so it is possible that one EA can work with more than one student in more than one grade.

Erickson said the amount of support is dependent on the needs of the student.

The variety of approaches in how an EA's time is allocated is unique to each school, but the Ministry of Education does have its own criteria.

The first is safety, whether the student is in danger of causing harm to himself/herself or others. The second concerns the student's personal care and physical needs where an EA may be required to supervise to ensure health and safety with essential medication and personal care procedures during the school day as prescribed by a physician or other health care professional.

Then there are students who need one-on-one intensive support to access learning outcomes, which would include students who are blind or have visual impairment, are deaf or hard of hearing or have an intellectual disability.

Lack of support has prompted McFarland to drive to Saskatoon two to three times a week and pay $250-$300 for a tutor to help her son.

After school when most kids are out playing with friends, McFarland said a lot of time, which should be her son's socialization time is spent focused on trying to build school skills.

At least once a week McFarland said she struggles getting her son to go to school, which she said is a direct result of his learning struggles.

Her biggest worry is her son's self esteem.

"I worry about him; just knowing his personality; that in five years if we can't get him to be less frustrated with school I am worried he is going to be labeled a problem child or other things just because he feels so low about himself."

The experience has been different for Jeff Zwack and his daughter Olivia.

Olivia, who has both down syndrome and autism, is just finishing up her first year of kindergarten at Warman Elementary School.

Zwack said his daughter's progress at school is a direct result of the educational assistants who work with her quite intensively every day.

It is one of the reasons why budgets cuts to educational assistants at PSSD concern him.

"Kids with special needs such as Olivia need intensive support in order for them to reach their full potential. It takes a lot of thought for a school division to trim areas or reduce staffing through attrition. That is understandable but kids with special needs need those supports and they are doing a disservice by removing them," said Zwack.
